That Uncle Sam will stand no such nonsense as having his vessels made a mark for British pop guns, and ransacked from deck to keelson at the pleasure of every bullying Lieutenant that takes a whim to do so, is just as plain as sunrise. He has already remonstrated against it, and has sent two or three menof-war to protect our commerce.

Before this scrape blows over, the pa pers will doubtless be filled with all sorts of rumors of war : John Bull will fret young man who never had made his mark fume and bluster in his characteristic style, and then issue instructions to his Mr. B. was reduced about 2300; and cruisers to mind their own business and leave Uncle Sam and his children to pursue theirs unmolested.

England knows better than to provoke war with the United States. Two Mr. Bingham the nomination for a third whippings from this side of the water, ought to satisfy her for one century, at least, and it will. Besides that, she has her hands full now. The Eastern war cost her millions of treasure, and the loss of thousands of her subjects, followed directly by the revolt in India, which will, before she gets well through with it, cost her twice as much more; add to this the prospect, remote though it may be, of a upture with France, and England will not have much heart to proceed to extremities with the United States, or to provoke a quarrel in any new quarter. But setting all these considerations aside we should as soon think of Maine waging war with Massachusetts, as Great Britain with the United States. It is here she gets her cotton, and here she finds a valuable market for her manufactured goods. We supply her with flour grain, and other articles of daily consumption; and the cutting off of these would be to her like the loss to a man of his right

Whatever other results may grow out of this unwarrantable assumption on the part of Great Britain, it will not be a war with the United States. But war or no war, a stop should be put at once to the violation of our national flag and honor by British cruisers, even though it should In that view of the matter, how does the involve the sending one of the latter to case stand?
